William Pitt at Burton Pynsent - Describing Pitt's life, Lord Macaulay writes: — "In expense, indeed he vied, during this part of his career, with the wealthiest of the conquerors of Bengal and Tanjore. At Burton Pynsent he ordered a great extent of ground to be planted with cedars. Cedars enough for the purpose could not be found in Somersetshire. They were, therefore, collected in London and sent down by land carriage. Relays of labourers were hired, and the work went on all night by torchlight. No man could be more abstemious than Pitt, yet the profusion of his kitchen was a wonder even to epicures. Several dinners were always dressing, for his appetite was capricious and fanciful and at whatever moment he felt inclined to eat, he expected a meal be instantly ready on the table."

A Georgian Memory: [By Llewelyn Powys]: the great West Country Road from London to Exeter at one time ran through the village of Odcombe, Somerset, and from there over Ham Hill. A little past the cross-roads named Five Ashes there still may be seen standing on the bank half-hidden in grass and bracken a weather worn milestone with the exact distance between Hyde Park Corner and the sandy Somerset highway, cut deeply into its surface. If the traveller walks westward a few hundred yards from this stone, he will observe a gate on his left which leads down to Pitt Pond. This miniature lake was made by one of the Phelipeses of Montacute House during the eighteenth century, at a time when landscape gardening on a large scale was a fashionable occupation with country gentlemen. Mrs. Ingilby, the eldest daughter of the last squire of Montacute, has told me that the pond owes its name to the fact that it was William Pitt, the elder, who first put the notion of damming up the stream that runs through the wood into her ancestor's head. It is likely enough that the Great Commoner had come over from his newly acquired property of Burton Pynsent to visit the Elizabethan mansion of his neighbour, his mind full the changes that he himself was making on his Sedgemoor hillside, and eager to share with any friend the advantages of his own lively invention. ...

The Late Mrs. S. M. Crossley: Death at Burton Pynsent: Memorial Service at Curry Rivel: Friends from many parts of Somerset and Dorset attended a memorial service at Curry Rivel Parish Church, on Monday, to Mrs. Sarah Maude Crossley, widow of Mr. Clement Crossley and daughter of the late Sir Morton Peto, Bart., who passed peacefully away at her home, Burton Pynsent, the previous Wednesday, at the great age of 91. Mrs. Crossley, who was a sister of the late Sir Henry Peto, Bart., of Cheddington Court, who died earlier this year, had lived at Burton Pynsent for over 30 years, having come there following the death of her husband. She took a keen interest in all the affairs of the parish and particularly the church, at which she was regular worshipper. She was a member of the Parochial Church Council for many years, retiring about two or three years ago and also played a leading part in the affairs of the Mothers' Union in that Deanery. For number of years Mrs. Crossley was also a member of the local Nursing Association. Her particular interest, however, was in missionary work, and for several years she had granted permission for missionary meetings, especially in connection with the Caravan Mission to Canada to be held at her house, which was also used as a retreat by many a missionary paying a return visit to his homeland. A lover of art and literature, Mrs. Crossley was also a great friend to the poor and in her earlier years was responsible for the foundation of St. Helen's Home in the East End of London, and also bestowed many acts of kindness on the people of Stratford E. Before coming to Burton Pynsent, she had lived at Landford House, Salisbury, and also at Corfe Castle. In politics Mrs. Crossley was a staunch Conservative and took an active part in the campaigns of her brother, Sir Basil Peto, a former M.P. for the Barnstaple Division. Her three children, two sons and one daughter, all predeceased her. ... (description of service and list of mourners) ...
